Work in Progress	"Land Use Regulation, its Determinants, and the Relationship with Households' Residential Tenure Condition" With Cynthia Goytia. Granted by the Lincoln Institute of Land Policy The main objective is to explore the economics of the generation of land use regulation. We examine the characteristics of the jurisdictions that are related to the existence of certain key aspects of regulation (e.g., infrastructure provision, access-to-land and redistribution related elements). The project also aims to improve our previous research on the effect of regulation on tenure informality. Our new sources of data will include an improved and extended version of our Regulation Survey to Planning Directors, and use of Satellite-based imagery (i.e., to measure developable and vacant land, new developments, etc) and the building and analysis of segregation indicators.

“Impact of Public Support to SMEs and Access to Financing”

This project is estimating the impact of some major national public funding and technical assistance programs on the performance of Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs). This paper is part of a broader research line studying the access to financing of small businesses in developing countries.
